

What Makes EHRA Different?

EHRA members are led by local people and held accountable by them, so our services are highly responsive to community needs and our housing investment has been sustainable. This contrasts with previous “top down” approaches to area regeneration where major investment was often followed by demolition and the break-up of communities.

Greater Easterhouse housing associations have a community-controlled approach to housing delivery. Local management and local solutions are critical in Easterhouse, because of the deep-rooted disadvantage and social problems that affect our communities. All eight organisations have gone beyond their original purpose as housing providers and are making a substantial impact in addressing the wider regeneration needs of local communities.
